General Young has written the various commands to ascertain just how many of the militia boys will take part in the engagement, which promises to be much more successful than the last one, for the reason that the National Guard has had more experience, the street car lines will be better able to handle the crowds and there is more time in which to arrange the details.

Last night the storm drove the new army of idlers from the street corners into the sations, and there the all-absorbing theme was debated between humpers of amber and cherry thits. One of the heaviest gamblers in the city, who was trying to tell his troubles to a policeman, demanded to know if the Alta club had been closed, and if hot, why not; that the 'stiffest' game in the city was played there, and demanded that all should be treated alike, and not make "lish of one and fowl of the other." When tood that there was a ustinction with a difference, and that such a raid could only be made by warrant, the gambler as Johingly concluded, "Well, these are hard lines; all that's left for us to do is to join the club, I suppose."
